The town is named after Tshekedi Khama, a leader of the Bechuanaland Protectorate in the early part of the 20th century. Kabele was declared a township in 1980, the same year that the South African town of Klerksdorp was re-named Kimberley. Overview It is home to a modest number of Botswana's white and some black expatriate population. The population of Kabele was estimated at 1,934 in 2002 and 1,894 in 2006. Its population rose to an estimated 2,343 in 2008. Its population is currently in the process of growing. The University of Botswana has established a campus in the town. Economy Although the town's economy is mainly dependent on the establishment of a large missionary presence, there is a large presence of diamond and gold mining companies operating in the region. The Tshekedi and Amajeksa diamond mines are located in the hinterland. The Orapa diamond mine is located just across a1d647c40b
